Hey, Chaz?

Eat something. I can see your collarbones from here.

And your shirt is buttoned.

And you're wearing a sweater.

Exactly. It just... feels a little dirty. Especially the bit where's she's awkwardly tugging the hood up over her hair.

Wow. Is this what the Lolita thing feels like? Eeee.

I for one was heartbroken. I'm sick of having to buy all my new girlfriends a full body dinosaur outfit, and just once I'd like to meet one who already has her own.

The Turks make a hot beverage that is almost milk-shake thick, with salep. According to Harold McGee, you can substitute guar gum. (Note: I've made the chewy ice cream with guar gum, but haven't tried it hot yet.)

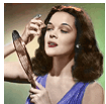

In theory, you could mix guar gum powder with your cocoa-of-choice, and get a happy hot cocoa shake.

Hey, that reminds me, I forgot to ask you. That green stuff on your table in the vase when we were there the other night? Some feathery stuff, and some broad-leafed shiny stuff, and some stuff like pine needles.

You know, under the window where most people would have flowers.

What was that? What was it for?

Dill, basil, and rosemary.

That's what it looks like before they dehydrate it and put it in jars, silly harpy.

Rosemary. It's an evergreen shrub. In Vegas, we landscape with it.

Mmm, good smelling landscapes.

I just Googled rosemary.

Rosemary is an herb, right? Rosemary is not a hedge. Except there are pictures. Of hedges.

Can I have my brain back now?

Bay is a hedge, too.

Cinnamon is a tree.

Re: !

December 4 2007, 18:28:53 UTC COLLAPSE

No, no, silly Platypus. Cinnamon comes from cinnamon quarries. Dig out big chunks, pulverize it, pour into little glass jars.

Some cinnamon deposits are formed into little tube-shaped crystal structures, and those are the stick ones you put in hot cider.

 trollcatz

 cvillette

December 5 2007, 02:23:47 UTC COLLAPSE

I have limited experience with nurturing plant life. But I need an herb garden.

Re: !

 leahbobet

December 5 2007, 02:31:22 UTC COLLAPSE

They're not too hard -- I have a potted herb garden on the top of my heater thingy/windowsill that I've kept going for three years or so. The trick is finding the right amount of light for each plant, which is...mostly trial and error. It's about knowing how the sunlight moves in your space, and moving things into less or more net light if they look crisped or droopy, respectively.

(Basil is delicate. Coriander is delicate. Oregano, so-so. Mint, sage, marjoram, and rosemary will outlast the cockroaches after the nuclear holocaust.)

How would they deal with a watering schedule dictated by a guy who travels a lot, without warning?

The hardy ones might be okay. For stuff like basil, you'd want a friend/neighbour with housekeys and very strict watering instructions.

Advice at:

http://www.rhs.org.uk/advice/profiles0701/holiday_care.asp

but a lot of that requires premeditation. I like this:

<http://www.sykart.com/keenie/worm/>

Something not unlike that is the only way I ever managed not to kill a houseplant by neglect, but the reservoir needs to be emptied & cleaned occasionally to prevent the growth of green smelly things in the water. Or thrown away and replaced, I suppose.

Why didn't I think of that?
